PROJECT DESCRIPTION

In Fall 2012, students at The Evergreen State College studied social movements as part of the program “Making Effective Change: Social Movement Organizing and Activism.” To prepare for their research project, students were organized into six thematic groups (two per seminar). The seminar thematic groups were Class / Economic Justice / Labor, Racial / Ethnic / Immigration, Militarism / GI / International Solidarity, Environmental Justice, Indigenous Sovereignty, and Gender / Feminism / Lesbian Gay Bisexual Transgender Queer (LGBTQ).

As part of their three-part research project, the students gathered web-based information about organizations within a social movement, which would be compiled as a class directory and released to the campus community. They used the Internet to find and research organizations that challenge the existing society to change (progressive, left-wing, etc.), and organizations that have historically defended the social status quo (conservative, right-wing, etc.). The organizations listed within each social movement section are divided into these two perspectives. In general, fewer groups were found in the second category, since the historical status quo perspective tend to have adequate resources available from large institutions (government, military, corporations, etc.)

The students used their research to familiarize themselves with the range of goals, strategies, tactics within the movements, and internal debates, in preparation for Part II of the project (analysis of a single organization within the movement) and Part III (an interview with an individual within the organization). They listed the organization name, website, the group-defined mission or goals, mailing address, phone, and email, in this format:

Name of organization

Website

Mission or goals

Mailing address

Phone

Contact/Email

Students selected a diverse range of organizations that are currently active, on a local, regional, national or global level.

The list is by no means comprehensive, and can only offer examples of social movement organizations. The Directory can only provide a starting point in researching these extensive social movements in the U.S. and abroad.

The Olympia-Rafah Solidarity Mural in downtown Olympia represents social movement organizations (from around the city and the world) as “leaves” on a tree.

MAKING EFFECTIVE CHANGE: SOCIAL MOVEMENT ORGANIZING AND ACTIVISM

2012-13 PROGRAM, THE EVERGREEN STATE COLLEGE, OLYMPIA WA

Social movements don't just happen. They emerge in complex, often subtle ways out of shifting historic conditions, at first unnoticed or underestimated. Social movements--across the political spectrum--push us to examine a wide array of questions about ideas, communication and organization, and how people are inspired and mobilized to create change. In this program, we will explore what individuals and communities can do about whatever issues are of most concern to them.

This program will examine methods of community organizing that educate and draw people into social movements, and methods of activism that can turn their interests and commitment into effective action. Key to this will be how movements construct and frame their strategies, using a toolkit of tactics. Our foundation will be the contemporary U.S. scene, but we'll draw on historical roots and lessons from the past, as well as on models from other countries. It will be crucial for us to look at the contexts of global, national and regional movements, and how they shape (and are shaped by) events at the local scale.

In fall quarter we'll undertake a comparative exploration of strategies and tactics of various social movements in the U.S. and abroad, and critically analyze their effectiveness and applicability. We'll explore movements based around class and economic equality (such as labor rank-and-file, welfare rights and anti-foreclosure groups), as well as those based around identities of race, nationality and gender (such as civil rights, feminist, Native sovereignty, LGBTQ, and immigrant rights groups). The program will also examine movements that focus on life's resources, from environmental justice to health, education and housing. Our examinations and explorations will take us across the political spectrum, including lessons from how populist movements effectively reach and mobilize disillusioned people, including right-wing populist movements, such as the Tea Party, pro-life/anti-choice and anti-gay movements, and anti-immigrant, anti-indigenous, and other white supremacist groups.

During winter quarter, we'll explore the ways that movements emerge and grow, focusing on themes that cut across organizations, and developing practical skills centered on these themes. Our discussions will include how movements reflect and tell people's stories (through interviews, theater, etc.). Central to our work will be an examination of ways to communicate with people from different walks of life, using accessible language and imagery (through personal interaction, popular education, alternative media, etc.). We'll critically examine how groups use mainstream institutions to effect change (such as press releases, research centers, legislative tactics, etc.). We'll examine and critique the use of the internet and social media in networking people, and share innovative uses of culture (film, audio, art, music, etc.). We'll assess the effectiveness and creativity of actions at different scales (rallies, direct actions, boycotts, etc.). Finally, we will look at relationships between social movements with different organizing styles, and how they have built alliances, as well as the internal dynamics within organizations.

Spring quarter will be a time for in-depth work through different types of projects: comparative critiques of movement strategies, critical social history of a movement, direct work with a local or regional movement, critical exploration of movement literature, or development of media, including such possibilities as social media, short film pieces, photography, web pages, photovoice, and podcasting. Throughout the program, our work will be shaped by a range of community organizers, activists, and scholars. Projects will use community-based research and documentation, with a view toward the sharing and presenting of work, in connection with partners and collaborators.

<http://16dayscwgl.rutgers.edu>
The 16 Days of Activism Against Gender Violence is an international campaign originating from the first Women's Global Leadership Institute coordinated by the Center for Women's Global Leadership in 1991. Participants chose the dates November 25 – International Day Against Violence Against Women – and December 10 – International Human's Rights Day – in order to symbolically link violence against women and human rights and to emphasize that such violence is a violation of human rights.
